THIRD CONSTRUCTION

JOHN CAGE 1941

The Writing of music is an affirmation of life, not an attempt to bring order out of chaos nor to suggest improvement in creation but simply a way waking up to the very life we're living which is so excellent once one gets one's mind and one's desire out of the way and let's it act of it's own accord.

John Cage

During the late 1930's a group of composers gravitated around Henry Cowell and his New Music Editions. Working together, to exchange ideas on percussion writing and techniques, these composers, later known as the Pacific Coast Group, were to irretrievably change the shape and boundaries of the conception of musical composition. The major figure from this group to emerge was John Cage.

From 1935 to 1937, Cage studied composition with Arnold Schoenberg. Cage adapted the 12 tone theory, "No sound any more important than any other..." [Cage], produced works using strict 12 tone technique, notably Metamorphosis, and proceeded to compose music for percussion.

Third Construction for 4 percussion players perhaps best demonstrates Cage's Percussion Theory. This composition displays Cage's fascination with non-conventional sounds. Each player performs on 5 graduated tin cans, 3 graduated drums, claves, and some type of rattle: Tin Can with Tacks, North West Indian Rattle, Wooden Rattle, and Indo-Chinese Rattle. Also employed are separate and unique sounds: Lions Roar, Conch Shell, Quijadas, Teponaxtle, and Cricket Callers. The notation is quite precise making great use of polyrhythms. However, Cage seemed interested with disguising the obvious. Often throughout this composition simple lines and duets compete with highly complex individual statements. Throughout this quartet Cage is obsessed with the control of pulse. This could well be his fascination with the rise of popular dance music during the late 1930's and early 1940's, or his interest in rhythmic counterpoint; nevertheless, one cannot possibly perform this music without dancing.
